Wm. P. S. Earle is a crank on settings, and evenings he would return home fussing about certain effects until his wife who, before her marriage was Bannie Taylor, a well-known illustrator and interior designer, offered her services. Now all those fancy touches which add so effectively to the pictures Earle makes for the Selznick Pictures Corporation owe much of their beauty to Mrs. Earle.

Mrs. Lewis Allen Brown, who won her spurs as an interior decorator is of great help to her gifted husband in the matter of the selection of locations. This picture shows an invention of theirs. A clay model of the scene where the climax takes place, is made, and this is worked over carefully to get the very best effects. Imagination, the trained eye of the artist and womanly sympathy, says Mr. Browne, are a wonderful help to him.

Who hasn't heard of the famous R. Cecil Smiths, the highest priced scenario writers in the world? Long before the public knew that Ella Stewart Carson and R. Cecil Smith were matrimonial as well as business partners, they were regarded as the most brilliant writers of continuity in the business. It is said their talents are perfectly complementary to each other.

Ralph Ince directs the professional as well as the domestic career of his wife with splendid success as has been seen in several recent pictures. Before marriage Mrs. Ince was Lucile Stewart, and although not so well known as her sister Anita, had already won favorable notice. "The Perfect Lover," "His Wife's Money" and "Sealed Hearts" are three samples of this co-operation.

Edward J. Montagne, continuity writer for Selznick Pictures Corporation was one of the pioneers in the scenario end of the game. When he married Agnes Takleif, a clever short story writer, the two started collaboration which has been a continued success. Mrs. Montagne considers with a shrewd eye the location her husband is pointing out as a promising prospect.

Can two temperamental souls abide in peace together year after year? Well the Tearles answer the question affirmatively. Adele Rowland, the celebrated actress, and Conway Tearle, the cause of more feminine palpitations than probably any other actor, are shown here with their dog happy outside their country home at Chappaqua.
